

JOSIAH BAYLY'S LAW OFFICE - 211 High St.

This small building was originally the law office of the Hon. Josiah Bayly, who acquired the property from Christ Church in 1796. Bayly was the ^{Fifth} ~~first~~ Attorney General of Maryland. He was also the lawyer for Patty Cannon who was involved with stealing and selling slaves, and charged with several murders. This building is still in use as a law office and has undergone relatively little alteration. It is a one story frame structure with a gable roof and external chimney on the north facade. The wood siding has beading along the lower edge. It is significant as one of the earliest surviving office buildings in Cambridge.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE
This building, still in use as a law office, has changed little since 1796. It is a small one story frame building with a chimney on the north facade and a gable roof. Originally it was a one room building, but another room has been added to the rear in salt-box fashion. On the front is a single door and a window, although neither is the original. The wood siding has beading along the lower edge.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

History:

This small building was originally the law office of the Hon. Josiah Bayly, who acquired the property from Christ Church in 1796. Bayly was born in Somerset County, Maryland, in 1769 and died in Cambridge, August 15, 1846. He is buried in Christ Church cemetery. In 1790, he moved to Cambridge and became the tutor of Congressman Scott's daughters, with the agreement that in return he should have board, the use of Scott's law books, and would succeed him in practice. (Scott's house, built in 1828, was later called the Old Straughn Property or the Old Dorchester House. It is no longer standing today.)

Mr. Bayly practiced law in Cambridge and was later distinguished as the fifth Attorney General of Maryland. Mr. Bayly was the lawyer for Patty Cannon, who was involved with stealing and selling of slaves, and was charged with several murders.

Significance:

This is the earliest surviving office building in Cambridge, that remains basically unaltered. It contributes to the historic character of High Street which possesses many buildings of architectural significance ranging from Pre-Revolutionary War to early 20th century construction.

This building served as the law office of Josiah Bayly (see 209 High Street) and dates from sometime after 1799. The land originally belonged to Great Choptank Parish and was part of that portion leased to John Caile in 1750. In 1796, the Vestry sold part of its land, including this lot, to raise money to build a new church. Rev. James Kemp, then rector of the parish and later Episcopal Bishop of Baltimore, purchased the lot. In 1799 he sold the land to Josiah Bayly and Bayly erected the office sometime afterward. The front part appears to have been built first, with the rear portion added as the need arose. After Josiah Bayly's death in 1846 the office passed to his widow and then to his son, Dr. Alexander Hamilton Bayly. Dr. Bayly rented the office to other local attorneys during the Nineteenth Century. The property has been in the possession of the Bayly family and their descendants to this day, with the exception of a few years at the beginning of the Twentieth Century. Currently the building serves as the office of Attorney Conrad L. McCulley, who has made some needed repairs during his stay.

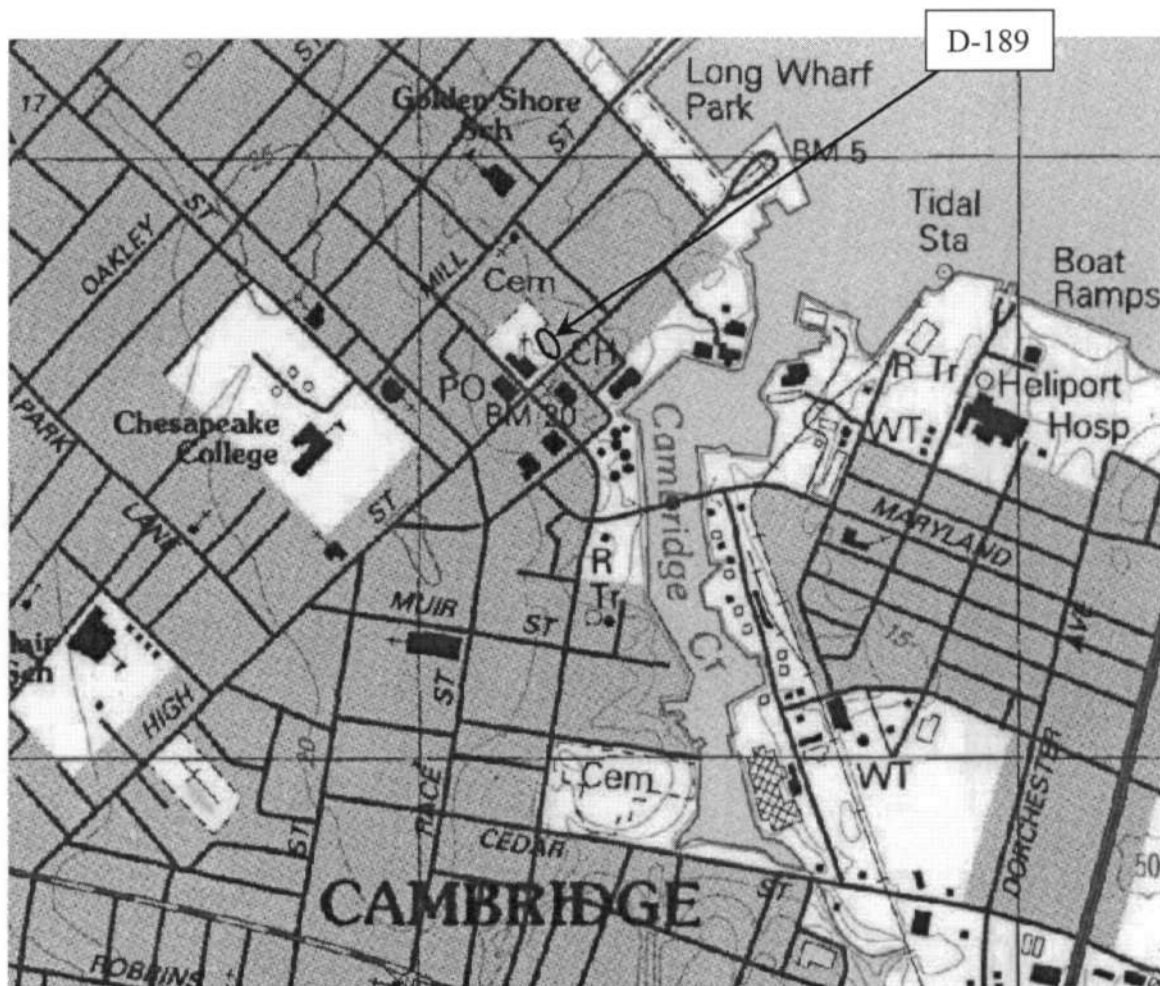

This little building, nestled as it is against the old graveyard wall, adds a certain charm and quaintness to this end of High Street. It is a good example of strictly utilitarian construction of the late Eighteenth Century. When it was built there was probably little thought given to its style or to the possibility that it might last for almost two centuries. This building, however, has a weak foundation and is in danger of falling apart. The rear portion has already started to sink.
